The very last person to ask Martin Amis a question when he came to talk about Time’s Arrow to the Guardian Book Club put his finger on something. "I wonder why you think you have been such a target over the years?" When he set out to be a writer, had he imagined that he would excite so much antagonism? "No I didn’t – everyone was so nice to me when I began." He thought it was to do with his father. While taught not to mock any person for their background, we were all free to despise Prince Charles (and he could see good reasons to do so). "So I’m sort of the Prince Charles of literature." He had become the British novelist about whom "you can say absolutely anything you like".

Whatever the explanation, you only have to look at the comments on the Book Club website to confirm the impression of a writer who provokes readers – to denunciation or to delight. He is a "bogot"; he is empty of talent; he is brilliant, the most cunning satirist. The sceptics angrily complain that he has conned the book-buying public; the enthusiasts debate the ranking of their top five "MA novels". The complainers, to be sure, tend to brandish a word that, in another place, might be thought to praise: "clever". Time’s Arrow, says one, is "a dismal book. Its purpose is to show off its own..."
closeness." "Yes, he's pretty clever," says another, "but he exhausted his brand of cleverness after London Fields."

Among the comments, there was more than one tagged "this comment has been removed by a moderator". Amis attracts dispute. We were discussing Time's Arrow on the very day that the author had created headlines by advocating "euthanasia booths" for aged citizens who had tired of living. Some readers presumed he was winding us up. "I thought the booths for old people idea was hilarious. Especially when someone took it seriously."

So thought some of the audience. "Hearing you observe that the Holocaust began with euthanasia camps, I'm reassured that the comments reported about euthanasia booths were a kind of satire of attitudes to ageing." "No, I mean it quite seriously – it's utopian, of course, it will never happen." Amis embarked on a defence of the ailing individual's right to end it all. Another reader declared: "You cannot separate Auschwitz from the comments you just made about the old people . . . they are the same thing." Some of those who come to hear Amis speak do so, like this one, to argue with him, and the author seemed happy to take up the challenge. "To die is a noble and human privilege that we should all have."

Some accusations clearly do make him angry. Amis's recollection of being called antisemitic for Time's Arrow was indignant. In response to one reader's recollection of the novel's reader acceptance in America, he expressed his distaste for the ease with which such labels were used in Britain. But you couldn't help feeling that controversy also stirred him. There were some in the audience who were thinking more of his comments on political and religious issues than of a particular novel. One member of the audience asked him "what sort of a response you felt you had to the book from the Islamic world?" "It never crossed my mind." "You must have had some Muslim readers, surely." "Not as many as I expected," Amis said.

By the end of the evening, perhaps the singular and clever novel with its cleverness after London Fields.

Sarah_Crown: Couldn't agree more RT @brenstrong "This is the night mail" - WH Auden youtube.com/watch?v=zmciuK ...

Sarah_Crown: RTing for users of the #books site: early 20th America Caesars

Sarah_Crown: This comment has been removed

Sarah_Crown: Find more tweets from our books team

Follow our books team on a Twitter list

Guardianbookshop

This week's bestsellers

1. American Caesars
   by Nigel Hamilton
   £25.00

2. It's All About the Bike
   by Robert Penn
   £16.99

3. Red Men
   by John Williams
   £16.99

4. Finkler Question
   by Howard Jacobson
   £18.99

5. Flavour Thesaurus
   by Niki Segnit
   £18.99

Search the Guardian bookshop

Latest reviews

On Deception by Harry Houdini

Encounter: Essays by Milan Kundera

Milan Kundera's exhumed essays cast a spell with their insights into creativity, writes Geoff Dyer

More books reviews

Bestsellers from the Guardian shop

Quality cotton handkerchiefs

These 100% cotton handkerchiefs come in a choice of men's or ladies?. Buy 12 get 12 free.

From: £14.98

Visit the Guardian reader offers shop

Green & ethical shopping at Guardian ecostore

Latest news on guardian.co.uk

Last updated one minute ago
Martin Amis joins the Guardian book club to discuss his 1991 novel Time's Arrow and is asked about his views on euthanasia.

More from Book club

Hosted by John Mullan, professor of English at University College London, the Guardian's Book Club examines a book a month, via a weekly column in the Guardian Review. The first three weeks discuss the book in question; the final column consists of a selection of your comments from the Book Club blog.